KATNIPPERY

The greatest Disney comics have always appealed to adults as well as children. On a child's level, "Mickey Mouse Vs. Kat Nipp" can be reduced to a simple cat and mouse game: cat holds territory, mouse uses tricks to put cat out of the way. Yet on another level, the tale is slyly sophisticated. The grown-up significance of fights for "territory" could be found in any Depression-wracked big city. And then there is the matter of catnip, or "nepetia cataria": a stand-in source of Jazz Age revels in the story, it is also Kat Nipp's "secret passion"—and Achilles heel, when Mickey uses it to turn Barnacle Bill against his boss. In an era when intimidating mobsters and scary tough guys dominated the popular imagination, Floyd Gottfredson gave readers the encouraging message that every oppressor had an exploitable weakness.

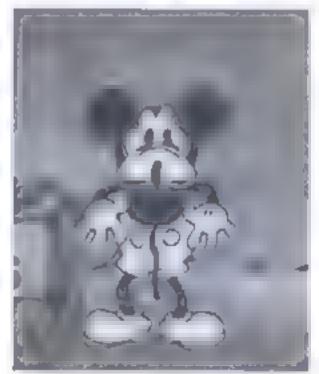

Kat Nipp predated Disney comics, debuting in the 1929 cartoons The Opry House, When the Cat's Away, and The Karnival Kid (pictured at right). Though Gottfredson would only use the feline one more time, Nipp has also been enlisted by Italy's Guglielmo Guastaveglia, Britain's Wilfred Haughton, and Denmark's Lars Jensen.
